In a wrongful dismissal lawsuit, an employer's best strategy has traditionally been to delay the litigation. The longer it takes before a matter gets to a trial the more likely it is that the former employee will find another job. Delay also causes litigation fatigue making former employees more willing to settle. This strategy is becoming less effective. The courts are increasingly awarding summary judgement which involves making a determination without the necessity of a trial. This means a faster process and takes away many commonly used strategies. This session will explain this development and help you strategize to deal with it and will discuss other strategies for managing wrongful dismissal claims.
